There is a demographic discrepancy between the Mv90 respondents and the RIPA data. Most notably in the Hispanic population. It is tempting to speculate people with a less than positive interaction are likewise less likely to respond to the survey. Best would be if somehow we could get a more representative sample of respondents. I hope the PD can look into way of improving their data collection. I know it is difficult but without a representative response rate it is hard to draw any real conclusions from the data.

Thanks much
